IN CRISIS, THE INDUSTRY AND OUR MEMBERS SHOW THE WAY

Rita Mallia, ACIRT Chair

Rita Mallia can vividly recall the early, uncertain days of the COVID-19 pandemic, when its shock waves were reverberating around the globe yet few could imagine the devastating impact it would have.

Looking back now, she views the construction industry and its many workers – and ACIRT members – as pivotal in demonstrating that we can endure and overcome.

‘We are very fortunate, and that’s to the credit of the industry and the members, because in the early days it was very uncertain what this pandemic actually was, the conditions it would create,’ Rita says.

‘There was uncertainty about people’s health and wellbeing, but we’ve worked through that, mechanisms were put in place to manage the risk. We can say the members did a great job in keeping the industry going in large part.

‘That made it easier for themselves, but it also assisted the broader economy to deal with the fact that many other industries were diminished or shut down as a result of Covid.’

As Chair of a Board that is made up of representatives of unions and employer groups in equal parts, Rita reports that the mix of face-to-face gatherings when conditions have permitted and Zoom hook-ups at other times, hasn’t impacted their capacity to make decisions that will benefit ACIRT’s 90,000 members.

‘We can say the members did a great job in keeping the industry going in large part.’

A special facility for members to draw down some of their ACIRT funds in the event of a stand-down was trialled for a time, and has been reintroduced as lockdowns continue to severely impact workers and their families. The uptake on claims wasn’t high, which points again to the industry’s resilience.

‘In some ways people were working more, around the clock, because of how they were staggering things on-site. There wasn’t much variation in the number of claims, which is good.

‘Now we’re in that boat again, and managing it in a similar fashion and constantly reviewing the situation to make sure people aren’t at risk.

People’s safety is the main priority at the end of the day.’

Faced with a challenge like never before, people’s adaptability has been heartening. Rita’s message to members remains the same: when you need us, we’ll be there for you.

‘ACIRT is there for members in their most challenging of times – when they find themselves without work. We’ll keep ensuring contributions are made and those funds are invested properly, so that when a member does require access to those funds they’re there for them when they’re at their most vulnerable.’

ACIRT BOARD APPROVES COVID-19 SPECIAL PAYMENT

IMPORTANT UPDATE FROM ACIRT CHAIR RITA MALLIA

ACIRT continues to be your Redundancy Safety Net

The ACIRT Board knows that many members will begin to suffer financial hardship as the COVID-19 crisis continues.

Normally you can only claim your benefit if your employment is terminated. This will continue.

As the crisis continues, the Board has expanded the conditions that you have to satisfy to claim some or all of your benefit to include if you have been stood down by your employer – up to a maximum of $10,000. Again, we call it our COVID-19 Special Payment. It is supported by both the union and employer organisations represented on the Board.

Our Special Payment is also designed to help the industry. It means that employers won't have to terminate their workers if there is not enough work. It will also make it easier for an employee to re-start when the crisis is over.

It is not an additional benefit. Effectively, your Special Payment is a pre-payment of the redundancy benefit you could claim on termination.

HOW ACIRT'S HELPING JUSTIN CROSS THE RIVER IN STYLE

Justin Durham, Water Treatment Operator

Justin Durham likes the camaraderie of working underground, the diversity of skills that tunnelling requires, and the way progress can be measured before your eyes.

'You become a machinery operator – excavators, bobcats, Moxy trucks,' he says. 'You're excavating with a Tunnel Boring Machine or road header, you can see the distance you've made each night, there's a sense of achievement every day.'

Working on Brisbane's Cross River Rail, he's switched from formwork carpenter to water treatment operator and is enjoying the ongoing security that tunnelling work provides. 'Once you're in the industry you pretty much stay in it, follow the work around.'

He reckons there's nothing better than having work in a time of crisis such as a global pandemic, 'and you don't have to think or have anxiety about how much is coming in'. Having the added security of ACIRT has given he and wife Caroline even greater peace of mind.

'I remember just thinking, "Yay!" Justin recalls of how he felt when he first joined ACIRT, soon after he'd

'What it's meant, it's been a backstop. It's an idea that you have a reserve flow of cash when you need it.'

switched to carpentry after driving catering trucks at Brisbane Airport around 20 years ago.

'What it's meant, it's been a backstop. It's an idea that you have a reserve flow of cash when you need it. In construction it's a very temporary world, it's always moving to and from, there's no permanency. So having that reserve has been fantastic.'

He's dipped into his balance between jobs several times, and after finishing up on the Gateway Bridge a decade ago had such a strong reserve that he put it towards buying a house. 'The other time was the Global Financial Crisis, it was just really healthy to have that money at the time.'

Now, while he's working nights on Cross River Rail, Justin's ACIRT continues to quietly grow.

'There's nothing better – it's like a bank account you don't have to think about it, it's just accumulating in the background for you.'

GETTING A BUZZ OUT OF BEING BACK ON THE ROAD AGAIN

Barry Martin, ACIRT Northern Co-ordinator

Barry Martin is a people person who can bring cheer simply by being a friendly voice on the end of the line. Among all that the past 18 months has taught him, he knows nothing compares to being on a work site and showing your smiling face in person.

While many industries have reeled amid repeated pandemic blows, the mood Barry encounters on his Queensland patch has remained upbeat as work on big projects like Cross River has forged ahead. He recently visited the Tweed Hospital site with his NSW colleague Ben Manna and caught up with workers who were similarly optimistic about the months and years ahead.

A $5,000 payment was twice made available to any workers who were stood down due to COVID-19 – the biggest payment by any Australian redundancy company – but the strength of the construction industry meant few needed to access it.

The horizon is bright, too, with the Brisbane Metro looming as a boom for ACIRT and its members as the only redundancy fund named in the project's agreement.

'Nothing beats running into people you haven't seen in quite a while and hearing them say, "How ya goin' Baz?"'

'We're picking up a lot more projects,' Barry says. 'If the workers have had ACIRT before, they'll understand about the distribution they get every November if they haven't made a claim. They appreciate that, they're happy to receive it or keep the money with us – and if they do need it they know it's there for them to access later on.'

While the past 18 months have highlighted for Barry that life can go pear-shaped in no time, he's been heartened by what we can do in the face of adversity when we work together to overcome the odds.

'Hopefully we can get on top of it and get some normality back in our lives, but in the meantime members know their ACIRT money is safe and they can access it when they need to. It's a bit of peace of mind for them.'

STEEL THE PERFECT FIX FOR SAMANTHA'S WORKING WORLD

Samantha Evans, Steel Fixer

Little more than a year ago Samantha Evans was working in a warehouse filling orders off shelves, a casual job with so little security that her shifts could be cancelled when she was already on her way to work.

To make ends meet she did some personal training on the side.

Now she works for Blue Steel Australia as a steel fixer, helping to build the new Martin Place station and office tower. Her alarm goes off at 4.20am, she works hard six days a week, and absolutely loves it!

'I like that it keeps you physically and mentally fit,' Samantha says, likening the jackhammers and drills she uses to carrying around her toddler. 'I've met new people and I've learnt something new in life – I didn't even know what steel fixing was. Actually, I didn't even know there was steel in concrete! Now I know that's the skeleton.'

Samantha is a Wiradjuri woman who was introduced to steel fixing through the Aboriginal Employment Agency. She felt overwhelmed at first, but only by the foreign nature of the work, and never because she and co-worker Tiarnee are the only female steel fixers on the job.

'The people I work with are very respectful, none of them have ever been mean or out of line. I prefer to work with males than females – I like to have a joke, talk a bit of rubbish, I don't get offended.'

Another education in her new job has been ACIRT, which a union delegate had suggested she look into before her boss told her it was like superannuation that you could access between jobs if the work dried up. She hasn't had cause yet, but is comforted to know it's there if she needs it, quietly growing in the background.

'To have work that's permanent, to know what I'm doing every day, and to have the support of ACIRT on top of that, it's been really good mentally. It gives me security. I did struggle a lot with Centrelink payments in the past, now I don't need that, I've got a full-time job, I can buy my daughter what she wants.'

BRINGING COMFORT IN A TIME OF LOSS

Ben Manna, ACIRT Southern Region Co-ordinator

Sometimes Ben Manna's job takes him not only into people's homes, but into their grief too. It's never easy, yet the comfort ACIRT provides makes the choppy waters of heartbreaking loss a little easier to navigate.

'I've been dealing with one family for a while, the guy passed away a few months ago and we've been working through their death benefit claim,' Ben says. 'It can be difficult going into those situations, hearing about how the person died, seeing the state the family's in – there's a young child and it's their father who you're doing the benefit for.'

'It can be hard, but you get a good feeling that you can get their money to them quickly.'

As the world has continued to ride the uncertainty of the COVID-19 wave, Ben has seen a trend towards members leaving their ACIRT balance to quietly build for an even rainier day, rather than dipping into it every time they find themselves between jobs.

'Even with people who are getting put off at the moment, they're holding off on claiming the money,' Ben says. 'They're more concerned about it being there for the bad times, rather than every time they change jobs they claim their money.'
